

I

rust cuts lines through nights horizon, and I am nothing, as I am what lays against those serrated teeth made of earth and soil biting tracks into my body, where what lays ahead of the sun moves without knowledge of its animation, as all that has changed is the position of your observation, because they passed through walls as the walls had passed into silence, the space produced of this cavity, this chest of mine they had hollowed out while dark continents had grown upon my skin, through my cheeks and across my vision, I am wrapped with the gauze of memories, the stigmata of my hand swelling against the white, crosshatching of a sentence left unpunctuated, bending to questions, dissolving before any sense of meaning can form the black, as I can only write from within the darkness, just they can only replace me without my knowledge, stamping these walls thick with mist where the ink swells of the oculi struck against the papers wax, alphanumeric language tailored through foreign frequencies and alarms, issuing from within those depths of anguished blue cutting across your field of blindness, where your sequence is textured by my understanding, such that there is an absence of a shapelessness, of words, of sounds and knowledge, what was once inscribed within the haze of sleep is now what breathes through the pores of insomnia, as my dreams have escaped the metal of their skein and begun to infect the worlds through the movement of your hands, as I had forgotten your skin above the steel which pierces quiet with clocks and trains and the hidden codes of the mechanisms describe time moving from the outside to within itself, as opposed to the linearity of your lips, are written upon in gold paint gnawing soft against the body of iron, hands without fingers rotating aimlessly, signing in abstract, where what is displaced from within the tick of it's quietude emerges in the interstitial gaps of a verdant memory, one that had traced those teeth of metal riveted to the nexus of your cognition, or perhaps it was my own, as where I stand now in relation to you means little beyond the sounds of our names, such that, they, like that memory which has transcended ownership, has been used to describe the path of recursion that has seen the cavity of clocks become the glass house of memories, where what has been permitted to change its shape and has done so not by design but instead by the movements made those dimensionless carriages you had painted by hand

II

III

but first we must go back: to when Japath stole numbered sand from the skin of Ham, rubbing the stitch of his wound with oil and water; to when I cut into my hands, so that the Euphrates may flow, the continental seance that pushed those toys of yours to the fore only to have the mirror of another's eye bind them; to the moment where I decided that what had been reclaimed by the outside world from within me would cease to exist if I no longer breathed upon its lips, that if the voices haunting trees spidered like glass, then the wood blanching beneath the flood could only ever be the limbs of my generation; where those assemblages of four digit sequences working backwards into ones of two, pivoting on the axes across the range of what is still odd, will become the chemical composition of my death, where the shadows that eat outwards from within the blue pushing gaps into the years remaining on these tracks, are those two digits burning above me the residue ferried between the only locations left to us where what lays to the left of you is the crescent etched in nights ink, the clatter songs of stars, singing in unison only from a perspective removed, as my hands have been tied with the twine of your fingers, ghosts walking across skin and char, soft between channels, as the river that runs across the plane of my hand is separated from the iron within, is shaped into the track marks of the elbow's instep, where what pushes day through the red strip of night exhales steam through dilation, your hands in my head of sleep, as how sure are you that you have a heart? that what beats inside of you is but the secret language of the blind man spelling fate upon the walls of your division, as all language has ever said is: I, and this conspiracy of organs, at whose station I awaited the 2:19 which never came, dreams growing in memories growing on leaves, haunting star veins as metal rivers as my visions that are to be memories wilt in the flames of premonition, stalking as the legs of God made a parable, are albino eyes siphoning energy from seedless trees, as what grows in that glass house is nothing that hasn't already been conceived, only that which had been forgotten, so of the four only I now remain, upon hind legs with grey eyes in my chest, unfolding my lungs as the language of moth wings, epigone of my father, watching as he paints with shades of the sea parted from my colour, interstices weeping sap that shows me that one who isn't, fishscaling through bites of gold yellowing coke grabbed at by plastics as the concrete breeds bellow

IV

and annihilation leaves room for nothing as nothing is the essence of it's centre