

I

there exists a space at times within the abyssal cavern which bisects reveries plain into ones of lucidity and delirium, where what remains of sleep within the depression of wakefulness breath heat against the instep of the hive undergoing a process of ossification as it reshapes itself into the image of my skull, where these fingers that had once belonged to one who had shared my face have become the six legs I brush against the anthers. And an exchange of phonetics is made in the absence of pollination, where conceptions moulded in the hands of another pollute the name I which was to be mine alone, so that as the I which no longer indicates only me encompass now all other means of identification in all the languages spoken and not spoken, does the intensity of the light begin to blind my ocelli. A triangulation of eye, who shares the same shape but never the same meaning, where what parses my eye can never become now that of an individualisation, the inherent nature of errata necessitating the advent of that which is to precede it

II

As what has occurred is a compaction of time, where the years through which I have passed have begun to drift gradually over one another, sliding from one groove to the next, where the metal tooth of a boundary is the mechanism of my confusion, such that, the year of your birth has become the one of my own, the dates of my definition having been lost, my first words having been spoken before I had yet had a mouth with which to say them, and I had lain in the hospital bed at the same time I had lain beside you, despite then not having yet met you, but whether I had or had not seems now irrelevant, as why can two or more things which disprove the other not both be true? a stimulation pressed against the skin of experience, finds equivalence between imaginations and truths, equivocation escaped from that which makes sense, as something does not need to make sense for it to exist, so that the contamination of identity is in fact simply our coexistence, and as I ask you my age, I am not really crying out of confusion, but rather out of fear that I may lose the you within me

III

The crackle of your breath which is parted by the spine on which it falls, whose ridges concur with that which you do not say, and which in response, I too do not say, for the aphasiatic counter can only be so in the space between words and time, where the steppes on which the snow drifts form is the consequence of a surplus of information such that it no longer has any meaning, the way a gallery of movement strips from my back a depth of space, or the mist which insights the trees are the mountains fall, where that which is considered tactile can only be so beyond the tips of your finger, so when I see your face there behind the tooth of it's eye, milk bent around the force that shapes you, are you only ever part of the image in my mind, as these teeth are everything, or maybe just everything of the where, soluble within the filaments of light painted against the skin of your smile, when as a favour to me you share the bridge of your nose, because the people around me are not who they should be, meaning, a break is not necessarily one of a sickness, as the allowance of its square shape has given me a refuge, where though the secondary reality imposed upon it's contours, there are brief periods where it's currents are allowed to pass though me, brief periods of a happiness, a one whose existence may not be permitted beyond the turning gate but whose realness is felt regardless, so the face you impart through those fissureless chambers, can only ever move half way between a translucence and the rejoinder of it's opacity

IV

To delve below the sequence of inverted memories, the river which hardens against the glass of it's underside, where moments of remembrance are falling either in turn, or out of turn, but never at turn, as only once having escaped from the unified field of their perception, can they be observed copulating with one another in groves growing in reverse, where the hermetic-self is impregnated by the seed of it's own imagination, an autogenetic progenitor beyond the hand of god, such that, in this apartment which I cannot recognise, but you say is mine, can I ask: Am I? rather than: Where am I? as the where has lost it's relevance by nature of order and recall, as how can I begin to disagree with my memories? where that turtle whose claws write upon the carapace of the one below it, it's language changing hands and shell, are hexagons of an insects vision drawn now from a technicolor well, it's waters cut at the many angles that turn slowly above us